FOR, prep. [Sax. for or fore; D. voor, for, and before; G. für and vor; Sw. för; Dan. for, för; Ir. far; Fr. pour; Sp. and Port. por, para; It. per, which unites for and L. per, and, if this is the same word, so is the Fr. par. Indeed, far seems to be radically the same word; for the Germans and Dutch use ver, far, in composition, in the same manner, and in the same words, as the English, Danes, and Swedes, use for. Thus Ger. verbieten, D. verbieden, Dan. forbyder, Sw. förbiuda, are all the same word, Eng. to forbid. The French use par as we use for, in pardonner, to pardon, to forgive, It. perdonare. Arm. par and pour, ـُـ in composition; Hindoo, para; Pers. بر bar or ber, ـُـ and بهر behr. For corresponds in sense with the L. pro, as fore does with præ; but pro and præ are probably contracted from prod, præd. The L. por, in composition, as in porrigo, is probably contracted from porro, Gr. ποῤῥω, which is the Eng. far. The Gr. παρα, and probably περα, περαν, are from the same root. The radical sense of for is, to go, to pass, to advance, to reach or stretch; and it is probably allied to the Sax. faran, to fare, W. for, a pass, foriaw, to travel, Class Br, No. 23, 37, 41. To go toward, to meet, or turn to, is the primary sense of for, in two of its most common uses; one implying opposition, against; the other, a favor or benefit; or for may be from fore, hence opposite. To sell or exchange a hat for a guinea, is to set or pass one against the other; this is the primary sense of all prepositions which are placed before equivalents in sale and barter. Benefit or favor is expressed by moving toward a person, or by advancing him. This present is for my friend; this advice for his instruction. And in the Old Testament, the face or front is taken for favor. For, in some phrases, signifies during, that is, passing, continuing in time. I will lend a book for a day or a month. In composition, for is used to give a negative sense, as in forbid, which is forebid, to command before, that is, against; and in forgive, to give back or away, to remit, to send back or to send away.]

1. Against; in the place of; as a substitute or equivalent, noting equal value, or satisfactory compensation, either in barter and sale, in contract, or in punishment. "And Joseph gave them bread in exchange for horses, and for flocks, and for the cattle of the herds;" that is, according to the original, he gave them bread against horses, like the Gr. αντι, and Fr. contre. Gen. xlvii. 17.

Buy us and our land for bread. — Gen. xlvii. 19.
And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot. — Exod. xxi.

16. Through a certain space; during a certain time; as, to travel for three days; to sail for seven weeks; he holds his office for life; he traveled on sand for ten miles together. These senses seem to imply passing, the proper sense of for.

"That ye may be the children of your Father who is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good." In such sentences, for has the sense of because, by reason that, as in No. 14; with this difference, that in No. 14, the word precedes a single noun, and here it precedes a sentence or clause; but the phrase seems to be elliptical — for this cause or reason, which follows, he maketh his sun to rise, &c. In Romans xiii. 6, we find the word in both its applications — "For, for this cause ye pay tribute also;" the first for referring to the sentence following; the latter to the noun cause.

FOR'AGE, n. [Fr. fourrage; Arm. fouraich; It. foraggio; Sp. forrage; Port. forragem; D. voeraadge. If this word signifies primarily food or fodder, it is connected with W. pori, to feed, and L. voro. But I take it to be from the root of Sax. faran, to go, and primarily to signify that which is collected in wandering, roving, excursion. In Port. foragido is a vagabond, and forrejar is to waste, to ravage.]

To lose or render confiscable, by some fault, offense, or crime; to lose the right to some species of property, or that which belongs to one; to alienate the right to possess by some neglect or crime; as, to forfeit an estate by a breach of the condition of tenure, or by treason. By the ancient laws of England, a man forfeited his estate by neglecting or refusing to fulfill the conditions on which it was granted to him, or by a breach of fealty. A man now forfeits his estate by committing treason. A man forfeits his honor or reputation by a breach of promise, and by any criminal or disgraceful act. Statutes declare that by certain acts a man shall forfeit a certain sum of money. Under the feudal system, the right to the land forfeited vested in the lord or superior. In modern times, the right to things forfeited is generally regulated by statutes; it is vested in the state, in corporations, or in prosecutors or informers, or partly in the state or a corporation and partly in an individual. The duelist, to secure the reputation of bravery, forfeits the esteem of good men and the favor of Heaven.

The Swedish til signifies to, and in this compound it signifies toward or back; so in L. remitto. See GIVE.]

1. To pardon; to remit, as an offense or debt; to overlook an offense, and treat the offender as not guilty. The original and proper phrase is to forgive the offense, to send it away, to reject it, that is, not to impute it, [put it to,] the offender. But, by an easy

Dan. frem, whence fremmer, to forward, to promote, fremmed, strange, fremkommer, to come forth or out; G. fremd, strange, foreign; D. vreemd, id. If m is radical, this word is probably from the root of roam, ramble, primarily to pass, to go.]

The sense of from may be expressed by the noun distance, or by the adjective distant, or by the participles, departing, removing to a distance. The sense of from is literal or figurative; but it is uniformly the same.

G.

G, the seventh letter, and the fifth articulation, of the English alphabet, is derived to us, through the Latin and Greek, from the Assyrian languages; it being found in the Chaldee, Syriac, Hebrew, Samaritan, Phenician, Ethiopic, and Arabic. In the latter language, it is called giim or jim; but in the others, gimel, gomal, or gamal, that is, camel, from its shape, which resembles the neck of that animal, at least in the Chaldee and Hebrew. It is the third letter in the Chaldee, Syriac, Hebrew, Samaritan, and Greek; the fifth in the Arabic, and the twentieth in the Ethiopic. The Greek Γ, gamma, is the Chaldaic ג inverted. The early Latins used C for the Greek gamma, and hence C came to hold the third place in the order of the alphabet; the place which gimel holds in the Oriental languages. The two letters are primarily palatals, and so nearly allied in sound that they are easily convertible; and they have been reciprocally used, the one for the other. But in the Assyrian languages, gimel had two sounds; one close, as we pronounce the letter in gave, good; the other compound, as the English j, or as ch in chase. In the Arabic, this letter has the sound of the English j or dzh, and this sound it has in many English words, as in genius, gem, ginger. It retains its close sound in all cases before a, o, and u: but before e, i, and y, its sound is close or compound, as custom has dictated, and its different sounds are not reducible to rules. It is silent in some words before n, as in benign, condign, malign, campaign; but it resumes its sound in benignity and malignity G is mute before n in gnash, gnaw; it is silent also in many words when united with h, as in bright, might, night. nigh, high. The Saxon g has in many words been softened or liquefied into y or ow; as Sax. dæg, gear, Eng. day, year; Sax. bugan, Eng. to bow.

The Celtic nations had a peculiar manner of beginning the sound of u or w with the articulation g, or rather prefixing this articulation to that vowel. Thus, guard for ward, gwain for wain, guerre for war, gwell for well. Whether this g has been added by the Celtic races, or whether the Teutonic nations have lost it, is a question I have not examined with particular attention.

As a numeral, G was anciently used to denote 400, and with a dash over it, $\bar{G}$, 40,000. As an abbreviation, it stands for Gaius, Gellius, &c. In music, it is the mark of the treble clef; and, from its being placed at the head, or marking the first sound in Guido's scale, the whole scale took the name Gamut, from the Greek name of the letter.

GA, in Gothic, is a prefix, answering to ge in Saxon and other Teutonic languages. It sometimes has the force of the Latin cum or con, as in gawithan, to conjoin. But in most words it appears to have no use, and in modern English it is entirely lost. Y-cleped, in which ge is changed into y, is the last word in which the English retained this prefix.

"Arthritic inflammation of the internal tunics of the eye (an inflammation commencing in parts most essential to the function of vision, in the retina, in the vitreous humor, and probably involving the choroid coat) has sometimes been called acute glaucoma, this term being derived from the greenish appearance of the eye. It has been called glaucoma from another symptom, which takes place where, without any enlargement of the vessels, without any very severe pain or absolute extinction of vision in the first place, the pupil exhibits the same greenish discoloration, a discoloration which obviously does not depend on a change in the crystalline lens; for it is more deeply seated; it occupies the fundus of the eye, and you can only see it by looking at it when you are standing directly before the patient, not by looking at the eye sideways. This is called glaucoma simply; and it appears to me to be a chronic form of the same affection as that to which the term acute glaucoma is given. This chronic form of glaucoma is important to be observed; for it is liable to be confounded with cataract." Lawrence, Lectures on Surgery.

1. Criminality; that state of a moral agent which results from his actual commission of a crime or offense, knowing it to be a crime, or violation of law. To constitute guilt, there must be a moral agent enjoying freedom of will, and capable of distinguishing between right and wrong, and a wilful or intentional violation of a known law or rule of duty. The guilt of a person exists as soon as the crime is committed; but to evince it to others, it must be proved by confession, or conviction in due course of law. Guilt renders a person a debtor to the law, as it binds him to pay a penalty in money or suffering. Guilt, therefore, implies both criminality and liableness to punishment. Guilt may proceed either from a positive act, or breach of law, or from voluntary neglect of known duty.

H.

H is the eighth letter of the English alphabet. It is properly the representative of the Chaldee, Syriac, and Hebrew ה, which is the eighth letter in those alphabets. Its form is the same as the Greek H, eta. It is not strictly a vowel, nor an articulation, but the mark of a stronger breathing than that which precedes the utterance of any other letter. It is pronounced with an expiration of breath, which, preceding a vowel, is perceptible by the ear at a considerable distance. Thus harm and arm, hear and ear, heat and eat, are distinguished at almost any distance at which the voice can be heard. H is a letter sui generis, but as useful in forming and distinguishing words as any other.

In our mother tongue, the Anglo-Saxon, and other Teutonic dialects, h sometimes represents the L. c, and the Gr. κ; as in horn, L. cornu, Gr. κερας; hide, G. haut, Sw. hud, D. huid, Dan. hud, L. cutis; Sax. hlinian, L. clino, Gr. κλινω, to lean; L. celo, to conceal, Sax. helan, G. hehlen, Dan. hæler. In Latin, h sometimes represents the Greek χ; as in halo, Gr. χαλαω; hio, χαω. In the modern European languages, it represents other guttural letters.

In English, h is sometimes mute, as in honor, honest; also when united with g, as in right, fight, brought. In which, what, who, whom, and some other words in which it follows w, it is pronounced before it, hwich, hwat, &c. As a numeral in Latin, H denotes 200, and with a dash over it, H, 200,000.

As an abbreviation, in Latin, H. stands for homo, hæres, hora, &c.

HĀ; an exclamation, denoting surprise, joy, or grief. With the first or long sound of a, it is used as a question, and is equivalent to "What do you say?" When repeated, ha, ha, it is an expression of laughter, or sometimes it is equivalent to "Well! it is so."

When we touch or approach a hot body, the caloric or heat passes from that body to our organs of feeling, and gives the sensation of heat. On the contrary, when we touch a cold body, the caloric passes from the hand to that body, and causes a sensation of cold. Lavoisier.

With these words coincides the L. æstus, for hæstus, heat, tide, Gr. αἰθω, to burn, and the English haste and hoist are probably of the same family. The primary and literal sense of all these words is, to stir, to rouse, to raise, to agitate, from the action of driving, urging, stimulating, whence Sw. hetsa, Dan. hedser, to excite, to set on dogs. See Class Gd, No. 39, and others. It may be further added, that in W. câs is hatred, a castle, from the sense of separating; casau, to hate; and if this is of the same family, it unites castle with the foregoing words. In these words we see the sense of repulsion.]

HU'MOR, n.† [L., from humeo, to be moist; Sans. ama, moist. The pronunciation yumor is odiously vulgar.]

1. Moisture; but the word is chiefly used to express the moisture or fluids of animal bodies; as, the humors of the eye. But more generally the word is used to express a fluid in its morbid or vitiated state. Hence, in popular speech, we often hear it said, the blood is full of humors. But the expression is not technical, nor correct.

Aqueous humor of the eye; a transparent fluid, occupying the space between the crystalline lens and the cornea, both before and behind the pupil.

Crystalline humor or lens; a small, transparent, solid body, of a softish consistence, occupying a middle position in the eye, between the aqueous and vitreous humors, and directly behind the pupil. It is of a lenticular form, or with double convex surfaces, and is the principal instrument in refracting the rays of light, so as to form an image on the retina.

Vitreous humor of the eye; a fluid contained in the minute cells of a transparent membrane, occupying the greater part of the cavity of the eye, and all the space between the crystalline and the retina. Wistar.

2. A disease of the skin; cutaneous eruptions. Fielding.

3. Turn of mind; temper; disposition, or rather a peculiarity of disposition often temporary; so called because the temper of mind has been supposed to depend on the fluids of the body. Hence we say, good humor; melancholy humor; peevish humor. Such humors, when temporary, we call freaks, whims, caprice. Thus a person characterized by good nature may have a fit of ill humor; and an ill-natured person may have a fit of good humor. So we say, it was the humor of the man at the time; it was the humor of the multitude.

4. That quality of the imagination which gives to ideas a wild or fantastic turn, and tends to excite laughter or mirth by ludicrous images or representations. Humor is less poignant and brilliant than wit; hence it is always agreeable. 5. Petulance; peevishness; better expressed by ill humor.

But this can not be true, for the word is found in the Celtic as well as Gothic dialects, and in the Arabic ﻴﺪ hand, Class Gn, No. 63; at least, this is probably the same word. The Welsh language exhibits the true sense of the word, which is a circle, a complete series. Hence W. cantrev, a division of a county, or circuit, a canton, a hundred. (See Canton.) The word signifies a circuit, and the sense of hundred is secondary. The centuria of the Romans, and the hundred, a division of a county in England, might have been merely a division, and not an exact hundred in number.]

1. An uneasy sensation occasioned by the want of food; a craving of food by the stomach; craving appetite. Hunger is not merely want of food, for persons when sick may abstain long from eating without hunger or an appetite for food. Hunger, therefore, is the pain or uneasiness of the stomach of a healthy person, when too long destitute of food.

I.

I is the ninth letter, and the third vowel, of the English alphabet. We receive it, through the Latin and Greek, from the Shemitic jod, je, or ye, in Greek ιωτα, whence our English word jot. This vowel in French, and in most European languages, has the long, fine sound, which we express by e in me, or ee in seen, meek. This sound we retain in some foreign words which are naturalized in our language, as in machine, intrigue. But in most English words this long sound is shortened, as in holiness, pity, gift; in which words the sound of i coincides with that of y in hypocrite, and at the end of words in unaccented syllables, as in holy, glory. It is this short sound of the French and Italian i which we hear in the pronunciation of been, which we pronounce bin. After l, this letter has sometimes the liquid sound of y, as in million, pronounced milyon. This sound corresponds with that of the Hebrews, as in Joseph, which in Syria is pronounced Yoseph, and with the sound of the German j, as in ja, jahr, that is, ya, yahr.

The sound of i long, as in fine, kind, arise, is diphthongal; it begins with a sound approaching to that of broad a, but it is not exactly the same, as the organs are not opened to the same extent, and therefore the sound begins a little above that of aw. The sound, if continued, closes with one that nearly approaches to that of e long. This sound can be learned only by the ear.

This letter enters into several digraphs, as in fail, field, seize, feign, vain, friend; and with o in oil, join, coin, it helps to form a proper diphthong.

No English word ends with i; but when the sound of the letter occurs at the end of a word, it is expressed by y: alkali, banditti, and a few other words of foreign origin, are the only exceptions.

As a numeral, I signifies one, and stands for as many units as it is repeated in times, as II, two, III, three, &c. When it stands before V or X, it subtracts itself, and the numerals denote one less than the V or the X. Thus IV expresses four, one less than V, five; IX stands for nine, one less than X, ten. But when it is placed after V or X, it denotes the addition of a unit, or as many units as the letter is repeated in times. Thus VI is five and one, or six; and XI is ten and one, or eleven; VIII stands for five and three, or eight, &c.

Among the ancient Romans, IↃ stood for 500; CIↃ, for 1000; IↃↃ, for 5000; CCIↃↃ, for 10,000; IↃↃↃ, for 50,000; and CCCIↃↃↃ, for 100,000.

I, formerly prefixed to some English words, as in ibuilt, is a contraction of the Saxon prefix ge; and more generally this was written y.

I, pron. [Sax. ic; Goth. and D. ik; G. ich; Sw. jag; Dan. jeg; Gr. εγω; L. ego; Port. eu; Sp. yo; It. io; Fr. je; Sans. agam. In Armoric me is the nominative; so W. mi, Fr. moi, Hindoo, me. Either ego is contracted from mego, or I and me are from different roots. It is certain that me is contracted from meg or mig. See ME.]

The pronoun of the first person; the word which expresses one's self, or that by which a speaker or writer denotes himself. It is only the nominative case of the pronoun; in the objective case we use me. I am attached to study; study delights me.

We often hear, in popular language, the phrase it is me, which is now considered to be ungrammatical, for it is I. But the phrase may have come down to us from the use of the Welsh mi, or from the French use of the phrase c'est moi.

In the plural, we use we and us, which appear to be words radically distinct from I.

Johnson observes that Shakspeare uses I for ay or yes. In this he is not followed, and the use is incorrect.

I-DE'A, n. [L. idea; Fr. idée; Gr. ιδεα, from ειδω, to see, L. video.]

1. Literally, that which is seen; hence, form, image, model of any thing in the mind; that which is held or comprehended by the understanding or intellectual faculties.

I have used the word idea, to express whatever is meant by phantasm, notion, species, or whatever it is which the mind can be employed about in thinking. Locke.

Whatever the mind perceives in itself, or is the immediate object of perception, thought, or understanding, that I call an idea. Locke.

The attention of the understanding to the objects acting on it, by which it becomes sensible of the impressions they make, is called by logicians perception; and the notices themselves, as they exist in the mind, as the materials of thinking and knowledge, are distinguished by the name of ideas. Encyc., art. Logic.

An idea is the reflex perception of objects, after the original perception or impression has been felt by the mind. Encyc.

In popular language, idea signifies the same thing as conception, apprehension, notion. To have an idea of any thing is to conceive it. In philosophical use, it does not signify that act of the mind which we call thought or conception, but some object of thought. Reid.

According to modern writers on mental philosophy, an idea is the object of thought, or the notice which the mind takes of its perceptions.

Darwin uses idea for a notion of external things which our organs bring us acquainted with originally; and he defines it, a contraction, motion, or configuration of the fibers which constitute the immediate organ of sense; synonymous with which he sometimes uses sensual motion, in contradistinction to muscular motion. Zoön.

2. Not easily; with pain or difficulty. He is ill able to sustain the burden.

Illy is sometimes but erroneously used for ill.

ILL, prefixed to participles of the present tense, and denoting evil or wrong, may be considered as a noun governed by the participle, or as making a part of a compound word; as, an ill-meaning man, an ill-designing man, an ill-boding hour; that is, a man meaning ill, an hour boding ill. It is more consonant, however, to the genius of our language, to treat these and similar words as compounds. In some cases, as before the participles of intransitive verbs, ill must be considered as a part of the compound, as in ill-looking. When used before the perfect participle, ill is to be considered as an adverb, or modifying word, or to be treated as a part of the compound; as in ill-bred, ill-governed, ill-fated, ill-favored, ill-formed, ill-minded. In these, and all similar connections, it might be well to unite the two words in a compound by a hyphen. As ill may be prefixed to almost any participle, it is needless to attempt to collect a list of such words for insertion.

Il, prefixed to words beginning with l, stands for in, as used in the Latin language, and usually denotes a negation or the sense of the simple word; as, illegal, not legal; or it denotes to or on, and merely augments or enforces the sense, as in illuminate.

Imagination I understand to be the representation of an individual thought. Bacon.

Our simple apprehension of corporeal objects, if present, is sense; if absent, is imagination, [conception.] Glanville.

Imagination, in its proper sense, signifies a lively conception of objects of sight. It is distinguished from conception as a part from a whole. Reid.

The business of conception is to present us with an exact transcript of what we have felt or perceived. But we have also a power of modifying our conceptions, by combining the parts of different ones so as to form new wholes of our own creation. I shall employ the word imagination to express this power. I apprehend this to be the proper sense of the word, if imagination be the power which gives birth to the productions of the poet and the painter. Stewart.

We would define imagination to be the will working on the materials of memory; not satisfied with following the order prescribed by nature, or suggested by accident, it selects the parts of different conceptions, or objects of memory, to form a whole, more pleasing, more terrible, or more awful, than has ever been presented in the ordinary course of nature. Ed. Encyc.

IN, a prefix, [L. in,] is used in composition as a particle of negation, like the English un, of which it seems to be a dialectical orthography; or it denotes within, into, or among, as in inbred, incase; or it serves only to augment, or render emphatical, the sense of the word to which it is prefixed, as in inclose, increase.

In, before l, is changed into il, as in illusion; and before r into ir, as in irregular; and into im before a labial, as in imbitter, immaterial, impatient.

IN, prep. [L. in; Gr. ἐν; Goth. in; Sax. in; Fr. en; Sp. en; It. in; G. in, ein; D. in; Dan. ind; Sw. in; W. yn; Sans. antu.]

In denotes present or inclosed, surrounded by limits; as, in a house; in a fort; in a city. It denotes a state of being mixed; as, sugar in tea; or combined, as carbonic acid in marble, or latent heat in air. It denotes present in any state; as, in sickness or health. It denotes present in time; as, in that hour or day. The uses of in, however, can not, in all cases, be defined by equivalent words, except by explaining the phrase in which it is used; as, in deed; in fact; in essence; in quality; in reason; in courage; in spirits, &c. A man in spirits or good courage, denotes one who possesses at the time spirits or courage; in reason, is equivalent to with reason; one in ten, denotes one of that number; and we say also one of ten, and one out of ten.

In the name, is used in phrases of invoking, swearing, declaring, praying, &c. In prayer, it denotes by virtue of, or for the sake of. In the name of the people, denotes on their behalf or part; in their stead, or for their sake.

In, in many cases, is equivalent to on. This use of the word is frequent in the Scriptures; as, let fowls multiply in the earth. This use is more frequent in England than in America. We generally use on in all similar phrases, and this is most correct.

In signifies by or through. In thee shall all nations be blessed. I am glorified in them.

In a hill, properly denotes under the surface; but in a valley, denotes on the surface of the land.

In that, is sometimes equivalent to because.

Some things they do in that they are men; some things in that they are men misled and blinded with error. Hooker.

In these and similar phrases, that is an antecedent, substitute, or pronoun relating to the subsequent part of the sentence, or the subsequent clause. God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. That is, in the facts stated in the latter clause, for which that is the substitute. Rom. v.

In as much; seeing; seeing that; this being the fact. I will ride for health, inasmuch as I am infirm.

In is often used without the noun to which it properly belongs. I care not who is in, or who is out, that is, in office, or out of office. Come in, that is, into the house or other place. Who has or will come in, that is, into office. A vessel has come in, that is, into port, or has arrived.

To be or keep in with; to be close or near. Keep the ship in with the land.

Not efficacious; not having power to produce the effect desired, or the proper effect; of inadequate power or force.

Ineffectual, says Johnson, rather denotes an actual failure, and inefficacious, an habitual impotence to any effect. But the distinction is not always observed, nor can it be; for we can not always know whether means are inefficacious, till experiment has proved them ineffectual; nor even then, for we can not be certain that the failure of means to produce an effect is to be attributed to habitual want of power, or to accidental and temporary causes. INEFFICACIOUS is therefore sometimes synonymous with INEFFECTUAL.
